Publication Type: Conference Paper/Unpublished Manuscript
Review Method: Peer Reviewed
Abstract: We present an analysis of the organization of counter-terrorist police strategies, specifically as they are planned and executed by the International Criminal Police Organization (Interpol). It is shown that at the international level between cooperating police agencies, counter-terrorist strategies are driven by concerns over an efficient management of information and its exchange among police. The target of terrorism is thereby (re)defined in a language that can be shared among the world's police institutions. As such, Interpol and its participating police institutions have 'de-politicized' terrorism and stripped it of its ideological-political justifications that create factions in the world of international diplomacy. However, these efforts to target terrorism (as crime) at the level of police agencies may not
