Atma Namaste, everyone. To our Muslim brothers, Assalamu alaikum. Fellow human rights advocates, fellow peace advocates....

It is said, according to a Great Spiritual Teacher, that war happens because people are gullible. They are “easily manipulated by dubious religious, military and political leaders.”

The key to stopping war is peace education. The masses need to be able to think for themselves independently and critically.

I came here to speak about ahimsa and karma as principles for our peace struggle.

What is ahimsa? It’s quite popular, popularized by the great teacher Mahatma Gandhi. Ahimsa or non-violence. According to Master Choa Kok Sui, ahimsa simply means non-injury or lack of cruelty or ill-will. We should practice ahimsa in the level of thought or consciousness... physically, mentally, as well as verbally.

Now, karma, as you know, is an ancient law. We cannot harvest what we did not sow. If we want peace, we should sow the seeds of peace. If we want our human rights to be respected by others, we need to respect the human rights of other people. If we want to be treated with dignity and respect, we should also treat other people in the same breadth. As it is said, what comes around... what goes around comes around. You sow the wind, you reap a whirlwind. That is a fundamental law.

Now, as a human rights advocate, we should realize that the law of karma and the principle of ahimsa are actually interconnected.

What we want is peace, both internally as well as externally. We can develop internal qualities that will help create a world that’s founded on healing, human rights and spirituality.
We cannot pursue peace without recognizing that divinity exists in each and every one of us. We should stress our own common humanity. In each and every person, at the core, lies the Divine Spark – the divinity underlying each person’s own humanity.

And this is the foundation of a new era of peace.

Thank you very much.
